Life in a Welsh ...

Merthyr Tydfil and the Welsh Men of Steel. by Ben Johnson. In the mid 1700's, Merthyr Tydfil was just a small Welsh farming village in the upper Taff Valley. Like the Seven Valley a little further to the north and east, at Ironbridge in Shropshire, the upper Taff valley contained all of the necessary ingredients for a successful iron industry - iron ore, limestone for lining furnaces, mountain streams to provide water power and forests to supply timber for the manufacture of charcoal.

The Old Iron Bridge of 1800, originally known simply as Merthyr Bridge before 1809, in Merthyr Tydfil, South Wales, was a cast-iron bridge across the River Taff.. Although an important early example of iron bridge-building and well known as a local landmark within living memory, the bridge has largely disappeared from engineering history.

Wikipedia Industrial Town

MERTHYR TYDFIL:

UNDERSTANDING URBAN

CHARACTER 9 Eventually, agriculture played a subordinate role to industry, and landholdings were primarily exploited for the value of their mineral resources....

Merthyr Tydfil

The town has a population of 43,820 (2011 Census). The town is often known as Merthyr. The town is said to be named after Tydfil, a daughter of King Brychan of Brycheiniog. According to her legend, she was slain at Merthyr by pagans around 480 AD; the place was subsequently named Merthyr Tydfil in her honour.

Merthyr Tydfil - Wikipedia

Merthyr Tydfil, my home town, was a place at the heart of the Industrial Revolution when Iron was King and coal its Queen. When the town went from being a farming village to a great Iron Metropolis, a melting pot of culture. A little like the Gold Rush but in this case it was the iron works that attracted the people.
